Acid is new weapon of choice in schools

Children as young as 12 are carrying corrosive liquids as an alternative to knives

Teenagers are taking acid and ammonia, hidden in drinks bottles, to school to use as a weapon. Pupils and youth workers have revealed that the use of corrosive substances in gang culture has seeped into school life.

Speaking on condition of anonymity, teenagers at schools around London said the practice, known as "dosing", was on the increase and described the methods used to obtain and disguise acid and ammonia.

It comes after several people were hurt in a suspected acid attack in an east London nightclub last Monday. Two people were left blind in one eye.

Earlier this year three boys aged 12, 13 and 15 were arrested after a suspected acid attack at a school in east London. The pupils at the Sydney Russell School in Dagenham were suspected of spraying three other pupils, who were taken to hospital.

Police are still investigating and no charges have been brought. Janis Davies, the head teacher, described the alleged attack as an "isolated incident".

Pupils at other schools, however, claim the use of weaponised substances is now alarmingly common. They all named the same brand of household cleaner as the most popular.

"You can get that for, like,

£5 and f*** someone's whole life up," one 18-year old said last week. "Or you can just buy ammonia: that's £3. Just keep it in a drinks bottle."

The boy, who has kept a bottle of "dose" since he was 12, said many carried it for self-defence: "A lot of people ain't got the heart to stab people ... it's just easier to squirt so meone."

Some schools now have metal detectors to catch pupils carrying knives, but these noxious substances are harder to stop.

A pupil of 18 at another school claimed he had been smuggling ammonia into classes since he was 13. He said it was "easier carrying acid than a shank [knife]" but acknowledged police were starting to be aware of the problem. "One of my boys was in jail for three months because he got caught with dose," he said.

Paul Leslie, the director of Young People's Rights and Equalities, an outreach group in Newham, said: "The use of acid and a range of other substances is on the increase."

Chief Superintendent Sean Wilson, of the Metropolitan police's East Area Command, said the force was working with schools and shops to tackle the problem.

"Assaults involving corrosive liquids such as acids are horrific and the impact on victims can be devastating," he said.

"We are working to understand why more people appear to want to use a noxious substance as a weapon."

Figures released by the Met last month showed a sharp rise in the number of acid attacks in London, from 261 in 2015, to 454 in 2016.
